

TUESDAY DECEMBER 4

From the Household Journal.
A PICTURE OF WAR.

BY JOSEPH BARBER.

To arms! No cry that ever shook the air,
Rouses the hero's blood, stirs up his friends' rage,
Draws forth the sword, dashes it at the foe,
Breaks the heart and maddens the mind.

O'er the iron trumpet-tongued and glittering field,
Came he the conqueror of the laurel'd train;

Wind-swept the iron, arrows with whose steel
Were scattered.

Behind the camp lay the mark of Cain.

'Tis grand to see the ringing bayonets,
A stark & grim sight to see them at arm's sets,

Teeth'd like the teeth of lions, and set as one,
Bent on the music of the field & the steel!

Bent on the issue, 'neath her sunless load,

And kindly hide the tort'le of death,

Waiting with sightless eyeballs at the skies.

Who die for demons, bleed for hireling's pay;

When will they learn—the mud and sword?

Not to be subjects in Ambition's play?

Battle is virtue, and virtue is the law;

War is the music of their iron draw;

And every warlike is Heaven's ignored,

Sawn who lies.

The Turkish Bath—Interesting Description of the Process of Bathing.

A Philadelphia paper thus speaks of the Turkish bath, lately established there, and the process of bathing:

When you enter you are furnished with a pair of slippers. You are conducted to a dressing-room, where you divest yourself of your clothes, and an apron is handed to you which you gird about your loins; then a sheet with which you wrap yourself; after which you are conducted into the bath-room, which bears some resemblance to an oven. The walls and ceiling are of brick, and the atmosphere is in the shape of a truncated oval. It stands adjacent to, and in front of, the swimming pool, from which it is separated by a wall of great thickness, built and coated with hydraulic cement. It is a somber place, set with ground-glass windows, admitting when the French call aujour. It is well ventilated, and this is necessary.

The first breathing is a trifle heavier than on Saturday, but without qualifiable change.
